

Fate

HOPE. HORROR. HEARTACHE. There's a little of each fated for all of us. Asher's world is a small one, bound by the conventions forced upon its people by an oppressive invader. But not everyone is content with their lot. A number of rebellious and independent women have grouped together, struggling against the might of the Grey Men. Asher is fearless but often it is too late once she realises danger is near. Women have always been secondary citizens in Venture, but under their new rulers Ventures menfolk too, and even the Oracle—the fantastic phenomenon at the centre of the city's life—and its adherents are subjugated. Everyone will be forced to work harder and harder against injustice merely to pay the tithe that their ruthless oppressors demand. People are driven to terrible actions and suffer insurmountable struggles. Asher is deeply suspicious of the Oracle but it still speaks and on Fair Day she is called to hear its message. Reluctantly she confronts her greatest fear—that the course of her life may have been mapped in stone—and a spectre from her past. But now, what she has always feared may present an unexpected chance to salvage her country's future. Asher must learn to listen to her instinct and face her fears if she is to save herself and her friends. She strives to set a new precedent not only for herself but for women everywhere, running against the tide of opinion and daring to challenge the authorities. Yet great sacrifices are made if the world is to be changed for good. Fate is a spellbinding fantasy tale about one woman's chance to save her people from the darkest throes of oppression. Exceedingly enjoyable. Goodreads reviewer. Mary Corran was born the younger daughter of an art historian and an Aegean Archeologist, which may explain the influence of Greek culture and history on her fantasy novels. Instead of pursuing an academic career, she decided to be a child of the seventies and travel overland to India and back. The need to develop a career sent her back to university to read History at Oxford, and marry a fellow student. After working in the City as an oil analyst for ten years, Mary went on to write the fantasy trilogy Imperial Light, Darkfell and Fate, which Venture Press will be publishing. Also available, a memoir chronicling her years of illness, Wasteland. She currently lives in Eastbourne, United Kingdom, where she is writing a new novel.
