

Pointed Roofs. Pilgrimage

Excerpt: ... handed the book to Ulrica, indicating the place and Ulrica read. Her voice sounded a higher pitch than Frauleins. It sounded out rich and full and liquid, and seemed to shake her slight body and echo against the walls of her face. It filled the room with a despairing ululation. Fraulein seemed by contrast to have been whispering piously in a corner. Listening to the beseeching tones, hearing no words, Miriam wished that the eyes could be raised, when the reading ceased, to hers and that she could go and put her hands about the beautiful head, scarcely touching it and say, It is all right. I will stay with you always. She watched the little hand that was not engaged with the book and lay abandoned, outstretched, listless and shining on her knee. Solomons needle snapped. She frowned and roused herself heavily to secure another from the basket on the floor at her side. Miriam, flashing hatred at her, caught Frauleins fascinating gaze fixed on Ulrica; and saw it hastily turn to an indulgent smile as the eyes became conscious, moving for a moment without reaching her in the direction of her own low chair. A tap came at the door and Annas flat tones, like a voluble mechanical doll, announced a postal official waiting in the hall for Ulrica
